

Excerpt from the winning book, Robots Like Blue by Tony Deeney

Alpha responded, partly as if talking to himself, "That seems to be very common in reports from others. It would appear that humans are very different. Our function is to do. Humans often seem to be content just to be. In fact, they designed us to do work for them, allowing them a great deal more time just to be. Though that is not a universal truth, sometimes they prefer to do things themselves that you could do quicker and often better."
